Hedda Ringgren

This week we as a team have come up with an idea for our project and together we have written user stories and started designing the UI. I have helped with this, as well as taking notes of our meetings.

My goal for the course is of course to learn scrum and getting better at actually starting projects and tasks myself. I feel like that is my biggest problem with developing things. When I sit in front of an IDE and have a task to do, it usually works out. It is getting there in the first place that is the problem. I also hope we can work well together as a team, despite not knowing each other very well.

Due to my experience of leading a team, I hope I can prove to be a good scrum master when I take that role. I like to design things and working front-end, so hopefully I can do that, but also going outside my comfort zone and learning new things. Because we are working with GitHub, I think I will learn a lot about git.

All in all, I am excited for the project to begin in earnest and for actually getting to develop something for a real product owner.
