Indiviudal Reflection

Alexander Neldefors
13/9 2019

At this point I am not really experienced with Scrum or agile development as a whole. I would like the result of our first sprint to be clean (no bugs) and make sure we fulfill all the acceptance criterias of the user stories we will take on (learning how to work as team efficiently and learning to be more structured). I think I can achieve this by first using a good git branching model (branch by issue for example) to make sure the master branch stays clean and bug free, but also making sure we all know what is being worked on and by whom. To make sure that all the acceptance criterias are being fulfilled I would like to use Test Driven Development in the project. Creating tests based on acceptance criterias and requiring all tests to pass will make sure that I don't forget about any accepetence criterias while implementing the code. If I by mistake forget an acceptance criteria, a test failing should reflect that. So by introducing these ideas to the team and explain the positives of using Test Driven Development, using a good git branching model, I think it will help the team to be more efficient and make sure we don't make any great errors during our first sprint.

My contribution to Scrum is that I have helped create and polish our user stories. I have also helped designing the mockup (team deliverable) by coming up with advice and ideas to make the GUI easy to understand and also making sure the GUI is fulfilling the accepetence criterias of our user stories. I also tried to make sure that we focus on our user stories before we start thinking about how we should implement the code. But in the future I would also like to help the team overcome any problems that we may encounter. I would do this by not being afraid to give people (or the entire team) constructive criticism and being afraid of bringing up difficult topics (that may hinder the team) during the team reflection. I would also like to make sure that I am not hindering the team in anyway. I would do this by welcoming constructive criticism and not being to proud to change my ways or asking for help.